

ANSWERS AND EXPLANATIONS

Each time a person enters the room, the computer generates a number and then asks randomly whether they should be given points. It counts the number of times. The data were not plotted until the end of the study, but that presentation was an effective way to allow the group to see what was happening. This study would frequently present the students a chart of the progress.

Although the researchers were not well trained, and the group spent the paper-folding, cutting, and stapling time, the average number of points earned by the group was not much less than when the students were given the paper-folding project. Having students do the folding may reduce the number of points they earn, but it does not prevent them from learning about the study.

The authors took a more sophisticated approach. The students were given a list of questions to answer for the study. The data were then plotted. The researchers were not trained in the statistical aspects of the data, including standard deviation, standard error, and confidence intervals. They were not trained in the statistical aspects of the data, including standard deviation, standard error, and confidence intervals.

Although giving the students an activity to do, the researchers did not give them a list of questions to answer. The students were not trained in the statistical aspects of the data, including standard deviation, standard error, and confidence intervals.

The researchers were not trained in the statistical aspects of the data, including standard deviation, standard error, and confidence intervals. They were not trained in the statistical aspects of the data, including standard deviation, standard error, and confidence intervals.
