

Evolution of Settlements:

- Anthropologists estimate that prior to 10,000 BC, most of the world's population was nomadic, organized into small, hunter-gatherer bands.
- In prehistoric times, a shift toward agriculture and sedentary life was caused by numerous factors, including technological advances that allowed for better access to land, such as irrigation, and improved tools and weapons that allowed for the domestication of animals and plants.
- In prehistoric times, the development of agriculture was driven by the need for more food, as well as the desire for a more stable and predictable life. The development of agriculture led to the formation of permanent settlements, which were often located near water sources and fertile land. The development of agriculture also led to the development of social hierarchies, as those who owned land and controlled the production of food became more powerful than those who did not.

Early People:

- The first humans to inhabit North America arrived approximately 15,000 years ago, migrating from the Bering Strait region in Siberia.
- The first humans to inhabit the Americas were hunter-gatherers, who lived in small, nomadic bands and hunted for food.
- The first humans to inhabit the Americas were hunter-gatherers, who lived in small, nomadic bands and hunted for food. They did not have agriculture, and they did not have writing.
- Other prehistoric groups, such as the Anasazi, lived in the Southwest and built large, multi-story buildings. They did not have agriculture, and they did not have writing.
- The first humans to inhabit the Americas were hunter-gatherers, who lived in small, nomadic bands and hunted for food. They did not have agriculture, and they did not have writing.

The Development of Agriculture:
