TYPE HZ-1 IMPEDANCE RELAY

CAUTION: Before putting protective relays into service, remove all blocking which may have been inserted for the purpose of securing the parts during shipment, make sure that all moving parts operate freely, inspect the contacts to see that they are clean and close properly, and operate the relay to check the settings and electrical connections.

APPLICATION

The type HZ-1 relay is a single unit high speed impedance relay with an impedance unit of the balanced beam type and a high speed directional unit. The relay is used for directional phase fault protection over 80 to 90% of the transmission line section and supplements the existing slow speed relays which protect the remaining 20 to 10% and provide back up protection.

CONSTRUCTION

The type HZ-1 Relay contains an instantaneous impedance unit, a directional unit, a contactor switch, and an operation indicator. The units are constructed as follows:

Impedance Unit

Construction details of this unit are shown in Fig. 1. A balanced beam is pulled downward on the contact end by a current coil and on the other end by two voltage coils. The fluxes of these two potential coils are shifted out of phase with respect to each other to produce a steady pull so that practically a constant balance can be obtained regardless of the phase angle between the current and voltage coil fluxes. A tap screw on the front of the unit permits changing the number of turns on the current coil, and a core screw on the bottom of the unit changes an air gap in the magnetic path. These two adjustments make it possible to set the unit.

A rectangular silver contact is flexibly fastened on the forward end of the beam. As the beam trips, the contact bridges two silver stationary hemispherical contacts mounted on the free end of a short leaf spring. A small set screw determines the position of the leaf spring and provides means for adjusting the contact gap.

Directional Unit Single Loop

The voltage coil of the directional unit serves as the primary winding of a small transformer. The secondary winding consists of a one turn movable coil, or loop, pivoted along its center line. This loop carries a current which is proportional to and substantially in phase with the voltage applied to the primary winding. The pivoted loop has a portion of its length lying in a magnetic field established by the current coils of the directional unit. The interaction of the current in the loop with the flux established by the current coils produces torque which rotates the loop in one of two directions, depending upon the phase angle relationship between the applied current and the applied voltage.

A ceramic arm extends from the moving loop and supports a rectangular silver contact which bridges two stationary contacts located on the right of the loop. The stationary contacts are silver hemispheres mounted on the lower end of vertically-hanging spring leaves. The contact separation is adjustable by a small screw near the upper end of the rigid stationary contact supporting arm. One of these supporting arms hangs parallel to each of the two stationary contacts. The set screw on the lower end of this arm provides the contact follow adjustment. An additional screw on the movement frame beneath the current coil iron limits the movement of the one-turn loop to the left.

Contactor Switch

This is a small solenoid type d.c. switch. A cylindrical plunger with a silver disc mounted on its lower end moves in the core of the solenoid. As the plunger travels upward the disc bridges three silver stationary contacts.
