Money Laundering in Canada Margaret E. Beare, 2007-06-09 Money laundering is the process of converting or transferring cash or other assets generated from illegal activity in order to conceal or disguise their origins In recent years the international community has decided that focusing on money laundering is an efficient strategy in policing organized crime and now terrorism To this end countries are encouraged to harmonize their policies and legislation and to some extent their policing strategies Before adopting these new strategies however it is important to understand the extent of money laundering in different jurisdictions as well as the likelihood of success and the costs involved in these anti laundering strategies This new work by Margaret E Beare and Stephen Schneider brings empirical evidence to the study of money laundering in Canada a topic that has recently assumed an international profile They challenge the seemingly common sense notion fueled by political posturing and policing rhetoric that taking the profits away from criminals is a rational law enforcement strategy Using data from police cases the inner working of financial institutions and the successful claims of privilege from our legal profession the final picture that the authors paint is of a good enforcement strategy run amuch amid conflicting interests and agendas an overly ambitious set of expectations and an ambiguous body of evidence as to the strategy s overall merits

Common Goods and Evils? Anja P. Jakobi,2013-07-04 Global crime governance has emerged as an important component of world politics It is manifested in national and international agendas the proliferation of global regulations growing international budgets and the enlarged mandates of international organizations As a result the definition and prosecution of crime is now increasingly homogenous but it also shows variance some crime policies are institutionalized coherently or attached to strong international organizations while others are weak or dispersed across different forums Based on sociological institutionalism this book examines questions of structural variance in the institutional design of global governance It shows that the interplay of strong actors and rationalization principles lead to more coherent forms of global crime governance while normative arguments related to crime are more likely to result in fragmented forms In consequence and contrary to many scholars assumptions global crime governance is strongest in those areas that are least attached to moral statements The book develops a theory of society and applies this framework to explaining the sources and consequences of institutional design Drawing on qualitative and quantitative methods the text analyzes the origins of global regulations how they are disseminated and why differences exist The role of the United States in creating global rules and disseminating them is emphasized Readers interested in international relations global governance globalization studies world society studies and criminology will benefit from the theoretical and empirical results of this book
