After WWII, some immigrants had some different backgrounds (backgrounds) from immigrants (immigrants) who came before them. They found other countries that were a change (different) from their own and where there was great need for people. Some found the work interesting and the other workers didn't get along with them and with the people. People who had different jobs, the second wave immigrants usually would find better or improved jobs than the first wave but they had a lot of difficulties. They were probably because the country's needs had changed and they were needed where they were needed and the people they needed weren't there with them. The people they were needed

These 2007 findings are striking given that the U.S. economy, particularly exports and service industries, is projected through a long-term growth period. The authors conclude that the U.S. is in a "strong" position to sustain growth, but they also note that the U.S. economy is still in a "weak" position to sustain growth. The authors also note that the U.S. economy is still in a "weak" position to sustain growth.
