Phosphatidylcholine (PC) is a major lipid component of cell membranes and is involved in various cellular processes, including signal transduction and membrane trafficking. The synthesis of PC is a complex process involving the transfer of a head group from a glycerophospholipid to a choline-containing molecule. This process is regulated by several enzymes, including choline transferase (CT) and phosphatidylcholine transferase (PCT). The study of PC synthesis and regulation is important for understanding the function of these enzymes and the role of PC in cellular processes.
