4. Repeat with other apps as desired to control or disable their cellular data access, when finished hit the Home button to exit out of Settings

You'll notice a number underneath each applications name, that number indicates the amount of cellular data used since the counter has last been reset (typically after a system restore, manual reset, or perhaps never if the phone is new). In these screenshot examples, the App Store has used 820MB of data, which is no big deal if you have an unlimited cellular data plan, but if you had a cap at 1GB you may find that setting important to disable, choosing instead to rely on a wi-fi connection.

Again, if you don't see this list on the iPhone it's probably because you didn't scroll far enough, it is located beneath the Personal Hotspot control settings.

Note that usage and controls for System Services and core functions like iMessage cellular use are managed deeper within the Cellular Settings panels.

Use this trick if you're looking for very fine-tuned controls over what applications can transmit on your iPhone or iPad data plan, it's a much better solution to turning off all data if just one or two apps are the hungry hogs and the rest of them aren't consuming much of the data plan.
