CLARA & BRAHMS.

BERLIN, Jan. 7.

DEAREST JOHANNES,

Once more I write to you on your own account? Can't you get off the decision about Düsseldorf until we have discussed it in Leipzig? All the best people in Düsseldorf long for you to come, including, of course, Friedrich Löwer; but she is calm and thoughtful about it, and keeps on writing to me that, much as she wants it, nobody would dream of her your asks, provided they must wait by you, as the neighbors in miserably poor and you would have to imagine the choice from top to toe, etc., etc. If only we could discuss it by word of mouth! The Brahmsians write to me to-day that I must not be over-hasty in my decision.¹ They very much want me to go there, but they begged me to remember how limited my opportunities would be in the little town, both as regards people and other things. As to the people, I confess I had been thinking about obtaining them only from a distance, but I quite realize that the matter requires very serious thought, and yet where am I to go? I certainly do not want to end my days here.

... Many thanks for your letter. But how bitter the separation from friends is, particularly when vital matters have to be discussed, as in your case now. That is why it is indeed a comfort to me to know that I shall see you soon, and then we can go over all the pros and cons and weigh them.

Good-bye for to-day. Now that I have written I feel relieved. A thousand hearty greetings from Your Clara.

¹ This seems to refer to some agreement she had been offered at Leipzig, about which Brahms writes to her in the next letter.—Ed.
