

Bura

The Bura was an aquatic reptile said to have lived in the lakes feeding and growing in the water. A small hole in the side of its head exposed its eyes. Unlike other reptiles it had a long neck and was said to be blind about the Bura. According to the legend, when they were first seen it was in the water. According to the legend, when they were first seen it was in the water. According to the legend, when they were first seen it was in the water. According to the legend, when they were first seen it was in the water.

Identities

Traditionally, there has been speculation that the Bura was an water-dwelling member of the order crocodylia. Infolly, crocodylia or alligators are also called "Bura" by the Agwans. There is large population of crocodylia which live in rivers in North Africa, Asia, Europe, Australia, and the Americas. The most fact that crocodylia are not impossible for preserved Indian crocodylia. The more fact that crocodylia are called "Bura" may not be very significant, since the Bura is described with some characteristics such as an elongated neck and a forked tongue. Some names of the Komodo dragon is "Land Crocodylia". Both Bernard Hensen and Kay Mackel regard the Bura to be a large Komodo dragon-like creature, and there are fossils of such a creature from Western India under the name of "Sauro" where they seem to merge into the Iranian traditional dragon or the Chinese dragon. George Eberhart writes rumors of a similar creature in the Tiger Marshes of Ind. called the afa, possibly the same thing as the Bura. Some also write in his checklist of unknown animals that similar reports in the Mekong River monster.

Cryptozoologist Karl Shuker claims that the Bura was a giant lungfish seeing that the provides a far more comprehensive, comparable match not only in terms of morphology but also with regard to behaviour. Shuker believes this explains the Bura's alleged ability to survive hidden at the bottom of lakes during the dry season. Shuker's view admittedly does nothing to account for the various other bur-like creatures in and in this article. It also does not account for the special features of the long neck and forked tongue.
