2. Another interesting question concerns a possible connection between the postulated cognitive states and the way in which the system is represented. Some have tried to associate, through a (partial) mapping, the frequency dimension of a population with some neural activity (e.g., and especially, and in a less controversial way, by associating the frequency dimension with the frequency of oscillations).

As a graduate student, the computer became a constant companion. I learned how to use the Internet as a source of information and how to use it to communicate with others. I learned how to use the computer to create documents, presentations, and websites. I learned how to use the computer to solve problems and to create art. I learned how to use the computer to learn and to grow.

† For training and research, we used the 100 subject training image components and search space as described in provide (http://www.cba.hawaii.edu/~cys/face/facecomp.html), and the 100 subject test images†. Subject components and images are available at <http://www.cba.hawaii.edu/~cys/face/facecomp.html>. To our knowledge, this is the largest set of subject images understanding of the subject's appearance, and therefore, we do not consider any of the complementary subjects' contributions to the subject space because any of them would be the subject's nearest neighbors in the subject space.
