

Introduction

In the critique "Targeting Global Protected Areas Expansion for Imperiled Biodiversity" Oscar Venter and several other researchers emphasize the approach taken by the Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD) with respect to the targeted Protected Areas. The researchers' work was published in the peer-reviewed Public Library of Science journal (PLoS). This critique focused on strategic methods using spatial analysis to support the targets of Protected Areas set by the CBD in a cost-efficient approach. Their study shows that using CBD measures the number of threatened vertebrates that would be protected is 6%. According to their proposals, if the CBD were to spend 1.5 times more than the cost of their approach, they would save 30% of the targeted vertebrates. Incorporating this proposal will minimize conflict, meet the proper targets, and increase protection over endanger animals.

Summary

The participation of many researchers around the world in the article published in PLoS, emphasizes the importance of emergent and cost-efficient approaches needed to reach the global Protected Areas targets set by CBD by 2020. The researchers began to measure the current protected areas using the International Union for Conservation of Natural category I-VI from the 2012 World Database on Protected Areas. They created a platform of 12.9% of protected areas on the Earth's non-Antarctic land surface. The researchers designed distribution maps for the terrestrial taxonomic groups that have been assessed for their distribution and extinction risk. The next step was to observe the costs of land. The researchers used a dataset on agricultural opportunity cost as a surrogate to estimate how much protected land would potentially be. Once understanding the costs, they created a gap analysis to be aware of the occurrence of threatened vertebrates within these new protected areas. Once the data was set, the researchers then used a systematic conservative planning framework Marxan to create scenarios for the protected area expansion. These scenarios included a variety of targets. There were four different results based on the lowest costs. Firstly, there was a national target, an ecoregional target, a threatened species target, and lastly a threatened species preference. The main result Venter and the other researchers found was that even though they implemented these protected areas for endangered species, 17% of theated vertebrates are not found in the areas, and 85% are still threatened and need extensive care. Authors estimated that to minimize costs, governments would have to pay a transaction cost of US $0.9 billion and US $4.9 billion as agricultural opportunity cost to meet their national level targets for 17% coverage. If the countries want to reach 17% targets based on protecting areas that are ecologically representative, the opportunity cost would be almost 5 times greater, estimated at $24.8 billion annually. These results indicate that protected area expansion targets using the minimal cost approach or protecting the ecologically representative lands would not be efficient approaches to conserve threatened terrestrial species.

Review & Evaluate

This critique was conducted by Oscar Venter and other many scientists that are expertise in the fields of Ecology and Nature Conservation. The researchers were able to identify Protected Area Networks that would meet the targets set by CBD at minimal agricultural costs. They successfully estimated the efficiency of the establishing the Protected Area expansion proposed by CBD through the usage of systematic conservation planning software Marxan. However, the authors failed to explain how the biodiversity of the endangered species would be conserved.
