

To what extent was Nationalism during the late 19th and early 20th centuries in Europe a key cause of World War One?

The beginning of World War One was marked by the assassination of the heir of the Austro-Hungarian throne, Archduke Franz Ferdinand. However, the assassination was only the penultimate catalyst of a long period of tension between the European nations. Nationalism was a key cause of WW1 but only to a limited extent. Although nationalism was a significant cause, there were multiple other causes that had a greater impact than nationalism. Militarism and the alliance system both played a larger role in the cause of WW1.

Nationalism was one of many significant causes of WW1. Nationalism is defined as a feeling of loyalty within a group of people that are united through the love of their mother nation¹. Nationalism can often cause individuals to believe that their nation is superior to others². Furthermore, nationalism convinced citizens that they were being threatened by other European countries and their plots for expansion. Germany appeared to be a threat to most European countries due to their desire for more land and power. Although, nationalism was prominent during the lead up to the outbreak of war, it was not the most influential cause. It can be said that nationalism simply caused citizens to rise up and support their government and the choices that they made. There were many mediums of propaganda being publicized in the European nations, which expressed nationalism. A song composed by Ernst Moritz Arndt titled 'What is the German's Fatherland'³ is a clear example of nationalistic publications in the lead up to WW1. The song says references both German and non-German
