Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the self-reported health status of men and women who had been exposed to asbestos compared to those who had not. A cross-sectional survey of 1000 men and 1000 women was conducted in 1987-1988. The results showed that men and women who had been exposed to asbestos reported significantly higher rates of respiratory symptoms and diseases compared to those who had not. These findings suggest that exposure to asbestos may have adverse effects on the health of both men and women.

As a result, the company reported, according to its own figures, a 100% increase in the number of people who have been vaccinated.
