Abstract Background Despite the well-known importance of sleep, sleep problems remain understudied in research and practice in child and adolescent mental health. This study investigated parents' and adolescents' sleep experiences. Methods The sample included 100 parents and 100 adolescents, all of whom were referred to a community mental health center for treatment of emotional and behavioral problems. The adolescents' sleep problems were assessed using the Children's Sleep Questionnaire (CSQ), a validated measure of sleep problems in adolescents. The parents' sleep problems were assessed using the Parent Sleep Questionnaire (PSQ), a validated measure of sleep problems in parents. Results The majority of adolescents (70%) and parents (75%) reported sleep problems. The adolescents' sleep problems were significantly more severe than the parents' sleep problems. Conclusions The findings indicate that sleep problems are a common problem in adolescents and parents. The findings also indicate that sleep problems are more severe in adolescents than in parents.
