

SPOTLIGHT

One of the fundamental concepts of vector algebra, and the second topic of this chapter, is that of the vector. Perhaps the most common physical application of vectors involves the addition of the forces acting on an object, and the resulting movement of said object. Newton's laws affect our lives in innumerable ways, from the motion of the force of gravity keeping the Earth in orbit around the Sun and to things placed on the ground in the atmosphere. Mathematics and physics can utilize our knowledge of vectors with amazing precision and accuracy.

Flight crews use the thrust of the engines (keeping the plane forward), its weight (the force of gravity, pulling the plane down), and its aerodynamic lift (caused by the air rushing over it). These aerodynamic forces can be broken into two components: drag, the resistance produced by the air flowing in the direction opposite to that of travel, and lift, which keeps the plane aloft (acting against weight perpendicular to the direction of travel). Each of these forces can be represented by a vector (or "point" in the diagram), where length represents the magnitude of the force and where direction represents a unit that flows generally in that direction.

However, the concept of the unit vector can be represented by a vector, giving the plane's speed and direction. Likewise, if the plane experiences a wind blowing at a certain speed in a certain direction, wind velocity can be represented by another vector. In this situation, the question arises: "At what speed (relative to the ground) will it often? How fast does the plane actually fly?" In other words, what is the minimum ground speed and what vector of the flight? This situation might look something like the figure.

The vectors in this equation and diagram illustrate the relation between wind and velocity. Notice, in the diagram, that the vectors u and v are u and v .
