For instance, instead of the increasing technological knowledge that industry-oriented management faculties have traditionally attracted, we had an equal number of management faculties that provided an education focusing less on technical skills and on teaching about the future. In 1990, management education programs would rarely program for preparing administrative managers, with a few exceptions (e.g., Harvard Business School's program for preparing administrative managers). The management program would be "future-oriented." This differentiation between management degree programs started to be perceived differently when the 1990s and 2000s rolled around. For example, the quantity of faculty who had been trained in quantitative training and management programs with strong quantitative orientation had been increasing rapidly over the years. In recent years, quantitative management programs could be described as quantitatively oriented or quantitatively oriented by their faculty, as well as quantitatively oriented. Significant growth among these
