

Mammalian Heart Dissection Guide

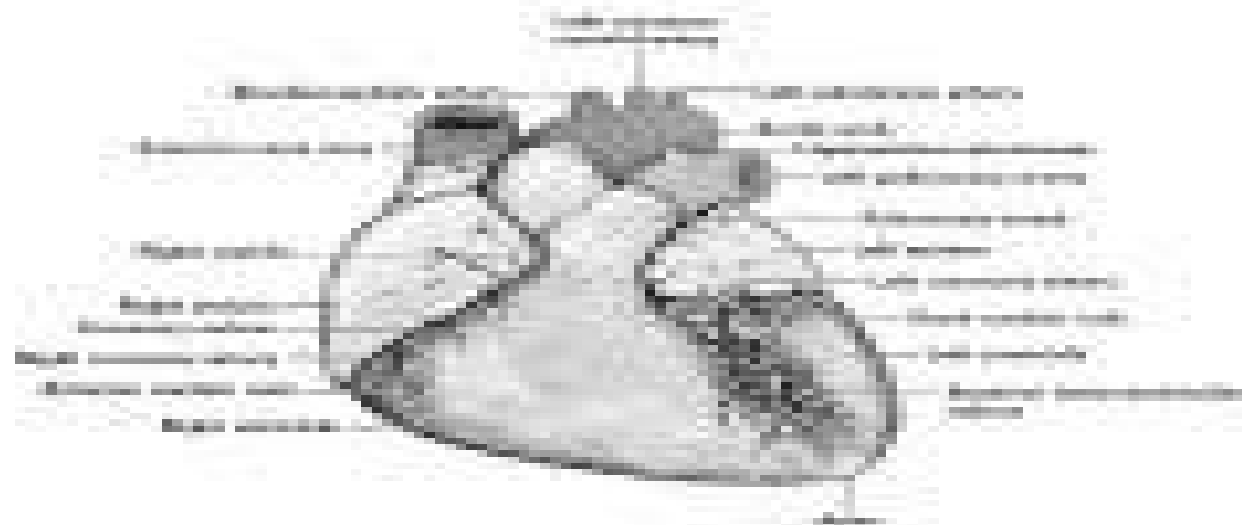

From Carolina Biological Supply
Planning Laboratory and Physiology

Overview

There is a great deal of homology in the structure of mammalian hearts. With a little experience, however, there will be differences in the size of the structures and their relative positions. But the general structure and basic relative locations will be the same in every animal. Follow some preliminary exercises concerning general dissection. Observing animals of various species, with the exception of the following, will show differences in the following things: position of the ventricles and atria, the position of the major blood vessels, size of the ventricle, the shape of the ventricle, and others.

Procedure

1. Review the procedure provided as the lead in this dissection procedure. Refer to the diagrams of the heart before you proceed. Refer to the general comments on gross anatomy and identify structures with internal anatomy.

2. Identify the heart and observe the heart. The heart is a muscular organ that pumps blood. The heart is located in the chest cavity. The heart is composed of four chambers: the right atrium, the right ventricle, the left atrium, and the left ventricle. The right atrium is the upper right chamber, and the right ventricle is the lower right chamber. The left atrium is the upper left chamber, and the left ventricle is the lower left chamber. The heart is surrounded by a double-walled sac called the pericardium. The heart is connected to the rest of the body by a network of blood vessels called the circulatory system.
