- These two observations are consistent with the idea that the observed increase in the number of species in the tropics is due to a combination of factors, including both the high rates of speciation and the high rates of extinction in the tropics. The fact that the number of species in the tropics is increasing, despite the high rates of extinction, suggests that the rate of speciation is also increasing. This is consistent with the idea that the tropics are a hotbed of speciation, and that the high rates of speciation are driving the increase in the number of species.
