Fig. 11. Schematic diagram that illustrates how computational models of memory use linguistic cues to determine whether observed "false" and "true" errors are differentially associated with false memory. In this model, the probability of observing a false memory is a function of the probability of observing a true memory, the probability of observing a false memory, and the probability of observing a true memory. The model is based on the work of Anderson and Schooler (1991) and Schooler and Anderson (1993).
