- What independent variables get between the independent variable and dependent variable? is often an important, if frequently overlooked, significant element in the system which characterizes the system. There is a variable identified as mediating process between the independent and dependent variables.
- What independent mediating variable? According to the path-analysis and structural equations models, the mediating variable is located between the independent and dependent variables. It is a variable which is hypothesized to be a causal link between the independent and dependent variables.
- What independent variable's relationship equation will yield a structural equation model? The structural equation model is a statistical model which is used to test the hypothesis that a set of observed variables is a function of a set of latent variables. The structural equation model is a generalization of the path-analysis model. It is a model which is used to test the hypothesis that a set of observed variables is a function of a set of latent variables.
- What factor influences the measurement? There are many factors which influence the measurement of a variable. These factors include the reliability of the measurement, the validity of the measurement, the accuracy of the measurement, and the precision of the measurement.
- What the process of measurement is described in the structural equation model? The structural equation model is a statistical model which is used to test the hypothesis that a set of observed variables is a function of a set of latent variables. The structural equation model is a generalization of the path-analysis model. It is a model which is used to test the hypothesis that a set of observed variables is a function of a set of latent variables.
