

UNIT 10- Government Macroeconomic Intervention

Chapter 45 - Government Macroeconomic Policy Objectives

Chapter 45.1: Inflation

Governments aim for low and stable inflation.

A range of factors influences this rate of inflation:

- Inflation rate of other countries: a country's firms may import raw materials or capital goods from a country experiencing high inflation. If it cannot source these from elsewhere, the country's production costs will rise which is likely to push up the country's inflation rate.

- A government and central bank's ability to implement anti-inflation policy tools is also influenced by what other governments and central banks are doing. If a government raises its income tax rates and other countries do not, the country may lose some of its skilled workers, and multinational companies may be discouraged from setting up in the country.

A rise in a country's interest rates above that of rival countries may attract an inflow of money into the country's banks.

This may push up the country's exchange rate, which may help to lower inflation but can reduce the international competitiveness of the country's products.

Chapter 45.2: Balance of Payment Stability

Governments usually aim for the total of credit items in the current account of the balance of payments to equal the total of debit items in the long run.

There are several reasons for this:

- A current account deficit reduces aggregate demand and can result in external debt.
- A current account surplus can be inflationary and can involve an opportunity cost of forgone imports.
