Abstract

Financial reports of business operations and performance were treated by accountants as the "black box," a closed world open to a few, that had no need for independent audits from outside. The common concern of corporations about the audit function—financial reporting, coupled with their internal and external auditing—was effectively sealed off from outsiders. Even subject to professional outside audits, the reports were often the only record that outsiders could rely on to determine what was going on in an organization or to evaluate its performance.
