Endocrine System and Endocrine Regulation

Background

The endocrine system has regulatory networks of glands, hormones and receptors. Together, the two components send distinct but sometimes diffuse messages and broadly influence the way organisms respond to environmental stimuli and behave.

Generally, all organisms have either one or, more often, more systems controlling and coordinating the processes within the body.

1. The nervous system, which sends rapid point-to-point signals by means of electrical signals passing along the axons of particular types of neurons.
2. The endocrine system, which is a slower system based on chemical messengers (the hormones) which are secreted from the glands (or other specialized cells) and travel via blood (or other fluid) to the target cells.

The nervous system reacts to stimuli with the endocrine system to control all body functions and processes.

Four principles govern how the system works: how hormones are produced, secreted and the nature of the chemical nature of the body.
