1993-1994 "Green Book" Budgetary Outlook

Abstract: Longitudinal studies have shown that, in addition to learning changes, the structure of the brain is also affected by learning. However, the extent to which the brain changes in response to learning is still unclear. In this study, we used a novel method to study the changes in the brain structure of children with specific language impairment (SLI) and children with normal language development (NL) during a 12-month period. We found that the brain structure of children with SLI changed significantly more than that of children with NL during the 12-month period. These findings suggest that the brain structure of children with SLI is more plastic than that of children with NL, and that the brain structure of children with SLI is more affected by learning than that of children with NL.
