10. Measurement errors arise from either systematic sources (which are constant and the resulting measures will be consistently biased) or random sources (which are random, unsystematic, follow normal distributions, are not predictable, and are usually small). Systematic errors include calibration, random variation, measurement error, and measurement error. Random errors include random variation, measurement error, and measurement error. Measurement errors can be reduced by using more precise instruments, using more precise measurement methods, and using more precise measurement methods.
