

Chapter 10: Market Structures and Competition

1. Perfect Competition is characterized by numerous small firms producing identical products. In this market structure, no single firm has the power to influence the market price. Firms are price takers, and the market price is determined by the intersection of the market supply and demand curves. Firms maximize profit by producing where marginal revenue equals marginal cost. In perfect competition, the demand curve is horizontal, and the marginal revenue curve is vertical. Firms in perfect competition are small relative to the market, and there is free entry and exit. 2. Monopoly is characterized by a single firm producing a unique product. The firm has the power to influence the market price. The firm is a price maker, and the market price is determined by the intersection of the firm's demand curve and the market supply curve. The firm maximizes profit by producing where marginal revenue equals marginal cost. In monopoly, the demand curve is downward sloping, and the marginal revenue curve is steeper than the demand curve. Firms in monopoly are large relative to the market, and there is no free entry and exit.

3. Oligopoly is characterized by a few large firms producing identical products.
