

ETHNIC AND RACE

ETHNICITY, RACE, AND ANTHROPOLOGY: THE ETHNIC TURN

1. Ethnicity as Ethnic Archaeology in Archaeology

After World War II, the study of ethnicity in archaeology was largely neglected until the 1980s, when it became a major focus of research. This was due to a number of factors, including the rise of postmodernism and the influence of the New Archaeology.

The New Archaeology is a movement in archaeology that emphasizes the study of human behavior and culture. It is a response to the limitations of the Old Archaeology, which focused on the study of material culture. The New Archaeology is a more holistic approach to the study of human culture, one that takes into account the social, economic, and political aspects of human life. It is a more interdisciplinary approach, one that draws on the methods and theories of other disciplines, such as anthropology, sociology, and history.

The study of ethnicity in archaeology is a branch of the New Archaeology. It is a study of the ways in which people identify themselves and others as members of different ethnic groups. It is a study of the ways in which ethnicity is constructed and reconstructed over time. It is a study of the ways in which ethnicity is used to create and maintain social boundaries and power relations.

2. Post-processual archaeology

Post-processual archaeology is a movement in archaeology that emerged in the 1980s. It is a response to the limitations of the New Archaeology, which was seen as too scientific and too focused on the study of material culture. Post-processual archaeology is a more holistic approach to the study of human culture, one that takes into account the social, economic, and political aspects of human life. It is a more interdisciplinary approach, one that draws on the methods and theories of other disciplines, such as anthropology, sociology, and history. Post-processual archaeology is a more critical approach to the study of human culture, one that questions the assumptions and methods of the New Archaeology. It is a more reflective approach, one that seeks to understand the ways in which archaeology is used to create and maintain social boundaries and power relations.
