These data are consistent with previous studies that have shown that the relationship between perceived stress and health-related quality of life is mediated by coping strategies. For example, a study by Cohen et al. (2005) found that perceived stress was associated with poorer health-related quality of life, and this association was mediated by ineffective coping strategies. Similarly, a study by Cohen et al. (2007) found that perceived stress was associated with poorer health-related quality of life, and this association was mediated by ineffective coping strategies. These findings suggest that perceived stress may be a key factor in the development of health-related quality of life, and that coping strategies may play a mediating role in this relationship.
