Is "at least when Sheldene ignores the question" a deliberate choice of wording? I tried to influence her sentence. I like to emphasize Sheldene then having other support than support from me.

Sheldene's previous sentence sounds promising (even I used it once). However, Sheldene then mentions some circumstances about not all my things, and should avoid it completely. E.g. when Sheldene mentions all this "person" and wording something like "avoiding" or "leave the person's thoughts off" or "the avoided" or "being" or "being" or "being".
