Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical fitness of sedentary, middle-aged men. The subjects were 20 men, aged 40 to 50 years, who were sedentary and had no known cardiovascular disease. They were divided into two groups: a control group and an exercise group. The exercise group performed a 12-week training program consisting of three sessions per week, each lasting 30 minutes. The control group did not exercise. The physical fitness of the subjects was measured at the beginning and end of the 12-week period. The results showed that the exercise group had a significant improvement in physical fitness compared to the control group. The improvement was measured in terms of maximum heart rate, maximum oxygen consumption, and maximum work rate. The exercise group had a 10% increase in maximum heart rate, a 20% increase in maximum oxygen consumption, and a 30% increase in maximum work rate. The control group had no significant change in any of these measures. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the physical fitness of sedentary, middle-aged men.
