

9.2 Homomorphisms and Isomorphisms 219

The most important outcome of the various forms of bonding and folding is that each different type of protein develops a unique shape, and its surface displays a distinct set of points of contact and ridges. As a result, a protein can react only with molecules that complement it in its particular surface features like a lock and key. Such a degree of specificity can provide the functional diversity required by many thousands of different cellular activities. Enzymes were the first catalysts for all chemical reactions in cells, and nearly every reaction requires a different enzyme (see chapter 7). This specificity comes from the architecture of the binding site, which determines which molecules fit in. The same is true of antibodies. Antibodies are complex glycoproteins with specific regions of attachment for bacteria, viruses, and other microorganisms; certain hormonal systems (gonadotropin-producing) react with only one specific organ in tissue; and proteins embedded in the cell membrane have receptor sites connected to a certain message. The functional three-dimensional form of a protein is termed the native state, and if it is disrupted by some stress, the protein is said to be denatured, such as heat, acid, alcohol, and some disinfectants (storage and flow denature the milk-tinge bonds within the chains and cause the molecule to become nonfunctional, as described in chapter 8).

The Nucleic Acids: A Cell Computer and Its Programs

DNA, the master component of cells, contains a special coded genetic program with detailed and specific instructions for each organism's heredity. It transmits the details of its program to RNA, "helper" molecules responsible for carrying out DNA's instructions and translating the DNA program into proteins that run proteins life functions. For now, let us briefly consider the structure and some functions of DNA, RNA, and a close relative, adenovirus nucleocapside (A/P).
