Death of the Drunkard Anne Louise Bannon, 2023-11-28 One inoffensive drunkard. So many reasons to kill him. A bold shooting ends the life of Mr. Hewitt, the buggy manufacturer, on a cold night in December 1872. Physician and winemaker Maddie Wilcox is particularly puzzled since it was clear that Mr. Hewitt was soon to die of his own dissipation. Nonetheless, she is drawn into searching out his killer by the grieving widow. Maddie soon finds out that there were several people who might have been offended by Mr. Hewitt, including those hoping to bring the Southern Pacific railroad to Los Angeles. As Maddie battles the usual winter colds and her own homesickness, the local men begin vying for her affections. Soon, Maddie realizes that she is searching for a killer determined to win the prize, no matter what the cost.

Death of the Chinese Field Hands Anne Louise Bannon, 2020-09-25 A night of chaos leads to more murders. Physician and winemaker Maddie Wilcox has always despaired of how violent Los Angeles is. But one night in October 1871, the pueblo explodes in a riot, and eighteen Chinese men are lynched. Shaken to her core and frustrated that she couldn't have done more to stop the violence, Maddie throws herself into her work, grateful that her three Chinese field hands were safe on her rancho that most terrible of nights. Until one of them is found strangled in her vineyard. At first, the murder seems like a random act against the scapegoated Chinese. Then a second of the three Chinese hands is murdered in the same way. Is the killer acting out against the Chinese in general, or only those working on Maddie's rancho? And if the latter, what does the killer expect to get A distinctive boot print and a bit of jewelry are all Maddie and her friends have to go on as Maddie continues to battle the usual panoply of injuries and rampant diseases that plague the pueblo Surrounded by prejudice daunted by her own limitations Maddie s hold on her passions starts slipping Can she keep her temper in check long enough to find the killer
