Abstract Background Despite the well-known importance of sleep, sleep problems remain understudied in research on physical activity. Objective This research project is designed to test three hypotheses about the relationship between sleep and physical activity. Methods The study will include baseline and follow-up surveys with participants in the community as well as laboratory-based sleep studies. Results Preliminary data suggest that sleep problems are associated with lower levels of physical activity. Conclusions This research will help to clarify the relationship between sleep and physical activity, and may lead to interventions to improve sleep and physical activity levels.

TABLE 1. Summary of the 1999-2000 season

Dr. Schindler, the primary author, says the researchers compared 100 "normal" and healthy individuals with a diagnosed depression or a diagnosed anxiety disorder. The study showed that the difference in the way the two groups reported feeling the emotion of love was in the frequency of the experience. Individuals with a diagnosis of depression or anxiety reported feeling love less often than the healthy controls. The researchers noted that the frequency of the experience was not related to the intensity of the feeling. The researchers also noted that the frequency of the experience was not related to the intensity of the feeling. The researchers also noted that the frequency of the experience was not related to the intensity of the feeling.
