Growing organic: building business and reaching shoppers through organic and natural frozen foods

It doesn't take a Wall Street financial analyst to see that the growth of retailers like Whole Foods, Wild Oats and Trader Joe's is a clear barometer large that a large number of American consumers are driving a demand and organic foods.

Much less clear is determining how traditional supermarkets and grocery stores an get on this bandwagon, especially with frozen organic products. The ship may be at the dock but fortunately it has not yet sailed.

The growth of organic and natural food sales has outpaced traditional food sales by a wide margin. The Organic Trade Association says retail sales of organic foods have been growing at a rate of 17% to 20% annually and are expected to reach $32 billion by the end of the decade. Conventional food industry sales at $550 billion pretty much dwarf the organic they are growing at only 2% to 3% annually.

The National Grocers Association (NGA), Arlington, Va., cites a study that looks at the combined sales of organic and natural food products. The data shows American consumers spending $45.8 billion dollars on these products in 2004 with sales expected to have increased another 10% in 2005.

NGA is putting considerable emphasis on organic and natural foods at its annual convention next month in Las Vegas with a workshop on organic and natural foods and a Whole Health Foods Center on the first row of its exhibit floor, second in size only to the Center Store exhibit area, the largest of 10 areas.

Consumers are concerned with the use of antibiotics hormones and pesticides in the food chain, says NGA. Specialty retailers and traditional retailers who are interested in differentiating their stores are turning to natural and organic products. This is proving to be an excellent means to compete not only against the supercenters but also to challenge the numerous convenience and dollar stores that have been entering the grocery industry.

Retail food shoppers are seeking the freshest and best produce, meats, dairy and sea-available, food available. In the past years, sales of packaged fresh produce is up 31.1%, organic packaged fruit is up 43.1% and packaged fresh vegetables are up 38.2%. Even the snack aisles are taking on a new look, says NGA. The natural cookies category is up 17.3% and natural crackers up 35% with only organic meats showing a higher growth rate than organic snack foods.

But successfully capturing the organic and natural consumer--and especially the organic
