Fruits Of Philosophy:

Fruits of Philosophy Charles Knowlton, 1877      Fruits of Philosophy: A Treatise on the Population Question Charles Knowlton, Consciousness is not a principle or substance of any kind nor is it strictly speaking a property of any substance or being It is a peculiar action of the nervous system and the system is said to be sensible or to possess the property of sensibility because those sentient actions which constitute our different consciousnesses may be excited in it The nervous system includes not only the brain and spinal marrow but numerous soft white cords called nerves which extend from the brain and spinal marrow to every part of the body in which a sensation can be excited A sensation is a sentient action of a nerve and the brain a thought or idea both the same thing is a sentient action of the brain alone A sensation or a thought is consciousness and there is no consciousness but that which consists either in a sensation or a thought Agreeable consciousness constitutes what we call happiness and disagreeable consciousness constitutes misery As sensations are a higher degree of consciousness than mere thought it follows that agreeable sensations constitute a more exquisite happiness than agreeable thoughts That portion of happiness which consists in agreeable sensations is commonly called pleasure No thoughts are agreeable except those which were originally excited by or have been associated with agreeable sensations Hence if a person never had experienced any agreeable sensations he could have no agreeable thoughts and would of course be an entire stranger to happiness There are five species of sensations seeing hearing smelling tasting and feeling There are many varieties of feeling as the feelings of hunger thirst cold hardness etc Many of these feelings are excited by agents that act upon the exterior of the body such as solid substances of every kind heat and various chemical irritants These latter feelings are called passions Those passions which owe their existence chiefly to the state of the brain or to causes acting directly upon the brain are called the moral passion They are grief anger love etc They consist of sentient actions which commence in the brain and extend to the nerves in the region of the stomach etc But when the cause of the internal feeling of passion is seated in some organ remote from the brain as in the stomach genital organs etc the sentient action which constitutes the passion commences in the nerves of such organ and extends to the brain and the passion is called an appetite instinct or desire Some of these passions are natural as hunger thirst the reproductive instinct the desire to urinate etc Others are gradually acquired by habit A hankering for stimulants as spirits opium and tobacco is one of these Such is the nature of things that our most vivid and agreeable sensations cannot be excited under all circumstances nor beyond a certain extent under any circumstances without giving rise in one way or another to an amount of disagreeable consciousness or misery exceeding the amount of agreeable consciousness which attends such ill timed or excessive gratification To excite agreeable sensations to a degree not exceeding this certain extent is temperance to excite them beyond this extent is intemperance not to excite them at all is mortification or abstinence This certain extent varies with different individuals according to their several circumstances so that what would be temperance in one person may be intemperance in another
