Figure 2 presents evidence that the two prearranged calls are followed by a change in the frequency of subsequent calls. The frequency of calls is significantly reduced after the first call and is significantly increased after the second call. This pattern of response is consistent with the idea that the first call is a warning call and the second call is a call for help.

These findings have implications for research on the development of the attentional system. Research showing that the dorsal attention system is involved in the selection of information from the environment (e.g., Posner, 1980; Posner & Petersen, 1990) suggests that the dorsal system is involved in the selection of information from the environment. The present study shows that the dorsal system is also involved in the selection of information from the environment. This suggests that the dorsal system is involved in the selection of information from the environment.
