Influence of the context on CH 16 Born a Crime

“Born a Crime” by Trevor Noah

Chapter sixteen, “The Cheese Boys” describes the lives of a group of teenagers during apartheid. During that time in South Africa from 1948 to 1994, the laws were designed to keep non-whites, who constituted a majority of the population, too poor and powerless to challenge the government. They were also obligated to reside in different regions as white people and to use different public facilities. Trevor Noah, the author, suffered from apartheid, and even though he doesn’t state it specifically in this part of the text, we can also assume from racism. This essay will argue that Noah’s privileged position as a worldwide famous comedian has had a big effect on the way this chapter was written and how the characters were presented.

Noah’s friend Bongani is presented in the text as a very likable, friendly character, who unlike Noah, lived in a poor and dilapidated neighborhood. Like in many instances in the chapter, the author juxtaposes Bongani’s friendly personality with a story of violence, when he “beat up one of the most infamous bullies of the school”. In the chapter, Bongani refers to his neighborhood of Alex as “the hood”, and it is presented by the author in an ironic way. We understand from the text that Noah is from a “rich”, white, neighborhood, and it could be that he misunderstood and continues to misunderstand this irony from a comparatively privileged point of view. Another indication that Noah’s socio-economic context has influenced the chapter is that all along, even more so while writing the chapter, he knew in the back of his mind that he had other options, he could leave and find a maybe, better life, while the others could not:

“Day to day I was in it as much as everyone else, but the difference was that in the back of my mind I knew I had other options. I could leave. They couldn’t”

Both of these points show that throughout his friendship with Bongani he always had a feeling of detachment from the experiences of the people he was associating with.

The main themes of the chapter are: apartheid, racism and the cycle of poverty. He describes convincingly the cycle of poverty that the population of Alex was stuck in. The title of the chapter, “The Cheese Boys” refers to the name given to anyone that had enough money to buy cheese. The fact that he is now a world famous comedian might change his perspective on how
