This concluding third pillar justifies the not necessarily self-evident proposition that private governance does not replace the role of the State. In contrast to private governance, the public standard sets the target. Both sides, states and non-state actors, must work to demonstrate what working governance structures look like. It is critically important upon which a healthy, free market can evolve and thus avoid market failure. In fact, the public standard is the critical element of the governance system. It is the standard.
