(b) Explain the pattern of wave approach shown in Fig. 4.1 and how the pattern affects the distribution of wave energy. [6]

5 To what extent can the threats to coral reefs be successfully managed? [20]

6 Evaluate the role of sub-aerial processes in the formation of erosional landforms in coastal environments. [20]

1. The distribution of seasonally humid tropical (savanna) environments in Africa is shown in Fig. 1.1. The savanna is found in the central and southern parts of the continent, between the equator and the Tropic of Capricorn. This distribution is due to the following factors: (a) Climate: The savanna is found in areas with a wet-dry climate, where there is a distinct wet season and a dry season. (b) Geology: The savanna is found in areas with a hard, crystalline basement rock, which is resistant to weathering. (c) Topography: The savanna is found in areas with a relatively flat topography, which allows for the accumulation of soil and vegetation. (d) Soils: The savanna is found in areas with deep, fertile soils, which are suitable for the growth of grasses and shrubs. (e) Human activity: The savanna is found in areas where human activity is low, allowing for the natural development of the ecosystem.

2. Weathering is the process by which rocks are broken down into smaller particles. It is an important process in the formation of soil and the development of landforms. In humid tropical environments, weathering is particularly important because of the high temperatures and high rainfall. The high temperatures and high rainfall lead to rapid weathering of rocks, which results in the formation of deep, fertile soils. These soils are suitable for the growth of tropical rainforest vegetation. Weathering also plays a role in the formation of landforms such as karst landscapes, which are characterized by the presence of underground caves and sinkholes.

3. Geology is the study of the Earth's structure and composition. It is an important factor in the formation of landforms. In humid tropical environments, geology plays a role in the formation of landforms such as karst landscapes, which are characterized by the presence of underground caves and sinkholes. Geology also plays a role in the formation of other landforms such as mountains, hills, and valleys. The distribution of landforms in humid tropical environments is therefore determined by a combination of geological and climatic factors.

4. The movement of waves approaching an irregular coastline is shown in Fig. 4.1. The diagram illustrates wave refraction, where wave fronts bend into the corners of a bay. This occurs because the wave fronts are longer in the deeper water and shorter in the shallower water. As the wave fronts approach the bay, they are forced to bend inwards, towards the headland. This results in the wave energy being concentrated at the headland and dispersed in the bay.

5. Coral reefs are facing a number of threats, including climate change, overfishing, and pollution. These threats can be managed through a combination of measures, including the establishment of marine reserves, the implementation of sustainable fishing practices, and the reduction of pollution. However, the management of coral reefs is a complex task, and it requires the cooperation of governments, scientists, and the public. The success of coral reef management will depend on the extent to which these measures are implemented and the extent to which the threats to coral reefs are reduced.

6. Sub-aerial processes are the processes that shape the land surface. These processes include weathering, erosion, and deposition. In coastal environments, sub-aerial processes play a role in the formation of landforms such as cliffs, dunes, and beaches. The distribution of landforms in coastal environments is therefore determined by a combination of sub-aerial and marine processes. The study of sub-aerial processes is important for understanding the formation of landforms and for predicting the future development of coastal environments.
