

ENGINE LUBRICATION

A conventional 2-stroke engine cannot receive its entire lubrication from an oil supply in the crankcase. Oil splash in the crankcase could be carried into the cylinder with the oil/air charge, resulting in high oil consumption and spark plug fouling. These outboards use the following method for engine lubrication.

Fuel/Oil Mixture

In this system, lubricating oil is mixed with the fuel. The oil is then carried to the piston and cylinder with the fuel mixture as it is drawn into the engine. This system has an inherent disadvantage. Since sufficient oil must be mixed with the fuel to meet the maximum lubrication requirements of the engine, the engine will receive excess oil when lubrication requirements are minimal, such as at idling.

The only fuels recommended for outboard, 2-stroke motor use are marine, automotive white, and aircraft gasolines of 90 octane or greater. The engine is extremely sensitive to changes in oil or gasoline types. Optimum performance can only be realized through consistency.

Never use any more (or less) oil in the fuel mix than a 50:1 ratio of gas to oil. Too little oil results in insufficient lubrication, scoring of cylinder walls, overheating, and eventual destruction. Too much oil results in plug fouling, knocking, carbon buildup and poor performance.

Never use an oil which has detergent. The detergents are basically dissolved metallic particles which can build-up on the piston and cause overheating and pre-detonation. Never use additives or "boosters."

Never use gasoline which has been stored for great periods of time; it contains substances which will turn to gum if stored too long. These deposits can cause carburetion problems and spark plug deterioration.

Always drain the fuel tank and carburetor if the engine is to be stored.

Don't be alarmed if the engine smokes excessively after having been stored for a few weeks, or even days, or after filling the tank with fresh pre-mix. The oil tends to settle out of the gas or will remain on the bottom of the tank if not mixed properly. This could cause problems since, as the fuel is used, the mixture will "lean out" and not lubricate as well as it should. Drain the tank into a suitable container and discard if old or re-mix if still fresh.

WATER PUMP/COOLING SYSTEM

These engines rely on a variable volume pump and, in some instances, a thermostat to control and reduce engine heat. The system works in some degree to that of an automobile and should be treated with the same respect if long engine life is expected.

Proper functioning can be determined if a steady flow of water discharges from the idle relief holes near the water line while the engine is idling. See Figure 6. If there isn't any flow, stop the engine immediately and check for the problem. Don't restart the engine until the situation is rectified or permanent damage will result. Check and clean the discharge holes with a fine strand of wire.
