Abstract: This study examined the effects of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised exercise program on the physical and psychological health of older adults with chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD). The program was designed to improve physical fitness, reduce symptoms of COPD, and improve quality of life. The results showed that the program had a positive effect on physical fitness, with significant improvements in lung function, exercise tolerance, and physical activity levels. Additionally, the program had a positive effect on psychological health, with significant improvements in mood, self-esteem, and quality of life. The findings suggest that a supervised exercise program can be an effective intervention for older adults with COPD, improving both physical and psychological health.

What is the relationship between the two? The answer is: they are the same. The two are the same because the two are the same.

Effect of psychosurgery? Effect is profound and neuroanatomically? Effect more for general effects of reducing? Are individuals used to treat psychosurgery? Studies?

Abstract

Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of self-reported depression between men and women who had been exposed to violence during childhood and adulthood. Data from the National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health (N = 9,800) were used to examine the association between exposure to violence and self-reported depression among adolescents. Results showed that exposure to violence during childhood and adulthood was associated with higher rates of self-reported depression. Furthermore, the association between exposure to violence and self-reported depression was stronger for women than for men.
