This paragraph contains a comma splice and the subject is a gerund (as commonly defined) because it was I who was doing the convincing. This paragraph does not contain a comma splice because the subject is not a gerund.

It is important to understand that a variable described as "invented" or "created" is not the same thing as a variable that is "discovered" or "observed." Invented variables are those that are created by the researcher, while discovered variables are those that are observed in the world. Invented variables are typically used in experiments, while discovered variables are typically used in observational studies.
