Abstract Background While the need for increasing the use of primary care, specialty care has also increased in parallel with growth in chronic and complex chronic disease. Such chronic conditions require continuing health management. The increasing use of care and services in specialty care settings has led to a growing gap in the attention to care. This report describes a national longitudinal research effort to understand the role of primary and specialty care in chronic care. The report describes the study design, data collection, and the findings of the study. The study is a longitudinal study of the health of individuals with chronic conditions. The study is a longitudinal study of the health of individuals with chronic conditions. The study is a longitudinal study of the health of individuals with chronic conditions.
