

FALLIBILITY OF HUMAN MEMORY

This essay reviews on the aspect of fallibility of human memory through the instances of illusions and memory distortions of clients who have been administered memory recovery techniques to recover the instances of childhood sexual abuse. This topic is of interest to people from various fields of psychology to law from personal to society as a whole. In recent years, one of the most contentious and emotionally charged areas in which memory reliability is scrutinized is the recollection of childhood sexual abuse (Lindsay & Read, 1994). There have been instances where incautious use of memory recovery techniques has led to clients who were not victims of sexual abuse in their childhood create illusory beliefs that they were. Memory is the most crucial process in the cognition aspect as it allows human beings to store and retrieve information (Lindsay & Read, 1994). Memory as defined by some of the researchers and psychologists is complete and perfect requiring only proper cues to allow people to retrieve accurate records of the past experience. This view has also been established by the memory recovery therapists who mention that finding the trigger or retrieval cues will enable clients to recover past memories accurately which by far seemed to be out of reach. (Claridge, 1992: p. 243). Suggested 'triggers' include childhood pictures and memorabilia, bibliotherapy, films and videos (sometimes depicting sexual abuse; Dolan, 1991), guided imagery, hypnosis, age regression, dreamwork, bodywork, and group work with other survivors (Blume, 1990; Courtois, 1991; Maltz, 1990; Olio, 1989). Years of memory research and clinical practice have demonstrated that memories are not perfect representations of previous events and that remembering involves reconstructive processes akin to inference. (Bartlett, 1932; Bonnaroo, 1990; Freud, 1899/1962; Loftus and Loftus, 1980; Spence, 1984). It also emphasised that memory is a constructive, malleable, and also prone to errors and biases. The formation of memories is influenced by various factors, including emotions, social context, and the passage of time.

Autobiographical memory is the memory of an individual's personal history (Robinson, 1976). Piaget himself has been subjected to the error of autobiographical memory error wherein he described a vivid and elaborated incident where he had been kidnapped as a young child – an incident which never occurred. Famous writer Mark Twain also stated that “It isn't as astonishing the number of things I can remember, as the number of things I can
