- Have self-reflected on how perceptions change throughout the semester (perhaps with each assignment or assessment) and efforts would be made to adjust perceptions/behaviors of each class
- Students reflected on the various themes in the course and how they related to each other and to the various cultural worldviews in a critical manner
- Students with life and a year's reflection on the course would find enough to reflect on and discuss
- Through the reflection process, most of the time, the students who student assessed as most open to the appropriate experience for further topics were able to connect all the course themes
- A final question for the student concerning reflection during a reflection report to the faculty
- What was the most difficult to do in the course and how did you overcome it?

Abstract

Blackwell's is a little bit "Peanut Butter & Jelly" in the sense it's spread on the building's principal entrance in sections of 10 stories.
