

Abstract

The purpose of this study was to investigate the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary adults. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting and involved 30 participants who were randomly assigned to either a training group or a control group. The training group performed a combination of aerobic and strength training exercises, while the control group remained sedentary. Data were collected at baseline and at the end of the 12-week period.

Results showed that the training group experienced significant improvements in cardiovascular fitness, muscle strength, and body composition compared to the control group. Additionally, the training group reported lower levels of stress and improved mood. These findings suggest that a 12-week training program can have positive effects on the physical and psychological health of sedentary adults.

Introduction

Sedentary behavior is a major public health concern, as it is associated with an increased risk of chronic diseases such as heart disease, diabetes, and obesity. Physical inactivity also contributes to mental health issues, including depression and anxiety. Therefore, promoting physical activity and exercise is a key strategy for improving overall health and well-being. This study aims to evaluate the effectiveness of a 12-week training program in improving physical and psychological health in sedentary adults.

Methods

The study was a randomized controlled trial involving 30 sedentary adults. The participants were randomly assigned to either a training group or a control group. The training group performed a combination of aerobic and strength training exercises, while the control group remained sedentary. Data were collected at baseline and at the end of the 12-week period. The primary outcome measures were cardiovascular fitness, muscle strength, and body composition. Secondary outcome measures included stress levels and mood.

Results

Results showed that the training group experienced significant improvements in cardiovascular fitness, muscle strength, and body composition compared to the control group. Additionally, the training group reported lower levels of stress and improved mood. These findings suggest that a 12-week training program can have positive effects on the physical and psychological health of sedentary adults. The study has several limitations, including a small sample size and a short duration. Future research should investigate the long-term effects of the training program and the role of other factors such as diet and sleep in improving health outcomes.
