METHODS AND MEANINGS

Histograms and Stem-and-Leaf Plots

A histogram is similar to a dot plot except that each bar represents data in an interval of numbers. The intervals for the data are shown on the horizontal axis. The frequency (number of pieces of data in each interval) is represented by the height of a bar above the interval. Each interval is also called a bin.

The labels on the horizontal axis represent the lower end of each interval. For example, the histogram at right shows that 10 students take at least 15 minutes but less than 30 minutes to get to school.

Histograms and dot plots are for displaying numeric data with an order. Bar graphs are for data in categories where order generally does not matter.

A stem-and-leaf plot is similar to a histogram except that it shows the individual values from a set of data and how the values are distributed. The "stem" part of the graph represents all of the digits in a number except the last one. The "leaf" part of the graph represents the last digit of each of the numbers. Every stem-and-leaf plot needs a "key." The place value of the entries is determined by the key. This is important because $8|2$ could mean 82 or 8.2.

Example: Students in a math class received the following scores on their tests: 49, 52, 54, 58, 61, 61, 67, 68, 72, 73, 73, 73, 78, 82, and 83. Display the test-score data on a stem-and-leaf plot.

Key
 $8|2$ means "82"
