Abstract: Pharmaceutical companies have been accused of manipulating the drug approval process to delay the entry of generic drugs into the market. This paper examines the impact of pharmaceutical company actions on the drug approval process. The results show that pharmaceutical companies can delay the entry of generic drugs into the market by manipulating the drug approval process. This is done by submitting a New Drug Application (NDA) for a drug that is already on the market, and then delaying the submission of a Supplemental New Drug Application (sNDA) for a generic version of the drug. This strategy allows the pharmaceutical company to maintain its monopoly on the drug for a longer period of time, and to increase its profits. The results also show that the FDA is not always able to detect these manipulations, and that it is often difficult for generic drug manufacturers to challenge the approval of a new drug. This paper suggests that the FDA should implement stricter regulations to prevent pharmaceutical companies from manipulating the drug approval process, and that generic drug manufacturers should be given more power to challenge the approval of a new drug.
