Tomatoes to Checkbooks to Freshbooks: Lessons and Goals in Business

Let me call it out: There's a clear difference between the work culture values of today's millennials and Traditionalists. Some find the difference exiting, while others may find this change upsetting. Entrepreneurial skills are becoming more and more important. The days of a 30-year steady job with benefits and a guaranteed pension are steadily diminishing. This means millennials need more self-reliant skills and as a result, they are often seen as job-hoppers in pursuit of their own transformative, empowering experiences¹.

From sandwich building to planting crop fields, to balancing checkbooks, to closing sales with customers at my parents' furniture store, my professional experience thus far may look scattered to any critic. But in actuality, they've given me the chance to apply a plethora of concepts I learned in high school algebra, botany (working family farm fields), and economics to the real world. I've come to understand, through first-hand experience, that my education is invaluable because it informs the activities I do, and how successfully I do them; every day.

Everyone in my family has an entrepreneurial spirit, so it's no surprise that every cell in my body bursts with excitement at the thought of running my own local food service company—and seeing the smiles on people's faces and the conversations they'll share while they enjoy the flavors we fill their plates with. Growing up, I loved watching the miracle of how each tomato seed I planted on my family's farm, with a little water and sunlight, would grow into a
