Abstract
 The hypothesis that the social environment affects children's cognitive and emotional development is examined in a naturalistic study of 100 children living in a residential institution. The children are compared to a sample of children from a noninstitutional community. Findings indicate that the institutional children have lower IQ scores and higher rates of emotional and behavioral problems than the children from the community. The results suggest that the social environment plays a significant role in the development of children's cognitive and emotional abilities.
